On such a road, operating trains at 170 miles an hour, or 249.4 feet a second, equal to 2.853 miles a minute (14,964.4 feet per minute), our system of signaling must be perfection itself. It must be automatic, not only in giving a danger signal to the motorman, but in making it impossible for him to obtain power from the third rail when the signal is at danger, and, in addition, must put on his brakes if he fail to do so himself. Furthermore, it must be of such a nature that any fault in any link of the system will throw everything to danger. A suggestion of such a system is outlined in Fig. 17 (also Fig. 18). The heavy hase line indicates the track; a-b, b-e, c-d, etc., are sections; each of a length not less than the distance which the fastest train would cover in the least allowable headway: while the smaller subsections--a-x, x-y, y-z, z-b, etc.--are of such length that any train running at its maximum speed can stop within any subsection without injury to the passengers. At a, b, c, d, etc., are signal towers, and. at x, y, and z are distance signals operated from the following tower. In the signal towers would be the power stations or substations for distribution and control of the current to the third rail. The horizontal line of numerals indicates the first, second, third, and...
