Warm syrup--white or brown, or pink, etc.--is poured over, and as the pills are rolled over and over they take the sugary coat which helps to protect the medicine within from deterioration, and also to disguise the nauseous drug. The process used in counting pills is always of interest and mechanical methods have been devised which are far more accurate than any human counting. Trays are used, each of which has 1,000 shallow depressions into which the pills fall. The surplus pills are poured off and in a few moments a thousand pills have been counted. These are weighed on fine metric scales. The weight of the entire lot of pills is also obtained and the results of the counting and weighing compared. The scales used are so finely adjusted that...
