Doubtless he wished to see me established in the same faith; nor was he disappointed in his pious desires. Whilst the grace of God was thus from year to year growing with my growth, the time arrived for me to devote myself more zealously to study. I had hitherto received instruction from private tutors; now, however, that I had reached my eleventh year, I was placed in the public school. Here I was in danger of losing all simplicity of character. There were many boys, already masters in wickedness, though not older than myself; and being much too weak in the faith to withstand their temptations, I was beginning to learn their ways. My father saw this, without seeing the means to obviate it. In his distress, he prayed incessantly, as he has since often told me, that God would be pleased...
