Excerpt: . . . to the other end of the cabinet, but looks back towards Ulrich, who, with hands outstretched towards her, remains where he stood. Oh, God, did I aught say I nothing said. No, nothing said !! Do you hear--and yet--Transported by her affection. Yes--yes--I did say! Take wings, My girlish prudery, unworthy simulation! Is he a man like others Why should that Ashame me that with pride my breast does fill What can on earth a woman greater do Than him to love--Ist not as though my own All that in you is great and noble, all You have achieved and are, I made in your souls high Flight took a share and shared your mighty deeds, If I love you--When love ennobles and upraises us--. Why not with gladness, like To a devotion freely yield to it Yet who am I to dare to you my eyes To lift The powr is given us, ist fair, Before our eyes the model, The luminous, to see, and should we not In our hearts recesses burn for it Yes, Ulrich--I confess it--yes, I love you, Love you with all the strength of a pure breast, to which You stand for the ideal in mankind! I love you--and watch, that which, while these words flow, My brow inflames is but the blush of inspiration, And not of shame! I early felt my heart Incline to you, when at the court of Albrecht I learned to know you....
