Excerpt: . . . which he had removed from a man 62 years of age, of spare habit, who, five years ago, began to suffer from symptoms of stone, and was then relieved of a small calculus, by the median incision, so far as he could judge from the appearance of the cicatrix in the perineum. A very short time, however, after this operation, the symptoms of stone re-appeared and increased in severity, especially during the past year. The urine was continuously bloody and voided every ten minutes in great agony. After putting the patient in bed, elevating the hips, and administering alkalies for a few days, he was sounded. The instrument entered the bladder, which was much contracted, without difficulty, but no rapping sound against the stone could be obtained, only a rubbing could be felt. It could be appreciated, however, by the exploration that the calculus was a large one. There was much tenderness in the hypogastrium, and examination by the rectum showed plainly the encroachment of the stone backwards, and gave great pain. After having examined the urine several times, and not obtaining any special evidence of kidney trouble, the patient was etherized, and a bi-manual exploration was resorted to, when a stone about the size of a ducks egg was recognized. In view of the great irritability and contraction of the bladder, and the size of the stone, he determined to resort to lithotomy rather than to attempt to remove so large a calculus by...
